can obtain a loan. However, the auditor should investigate the provisions in each policy concerning the privilege of borrowing.

There are three principal methods followed by life insurance companies in the granting of loans. According to one method the policy is retained by the insurance company until the loan is liquidated. Another method requires the endorsement of the insurance company on the policy but the policy may remain in the custody of the insured. In still another method the loan may be granted without requiring the deposit of the policy either for endorsement or for the duration of the loan. Under the first two methods the auditor's attention will be called to the fact that the policy has been pledged as security for a loan. However, because of the last method of granting loans and because of the fact that the insurance company necessarily may not be the pledgee, confirmation of the status of the policies with respect to loans and assignments should be obtained in all instances by correspondence with the insurance company.
